

CARROLL COUNTY.

Although on the line of the Great Trail and traversed from northeast to southwest by a branch trail leading from the Great Trail to the forks of the Muskingum, Carroll county appears never to have been the seat of any extensive permanent aboriginal occupation. This may be due in part to the absence of important streams or extensive valleys, in a country otherwise attractive, although rather rugged in topography.

The only mound so far located, is in the northeastern part of Washington township, with a village site and cemetery in Center township, a village and burial site in Perry township and a burial in Lee township. A comparatively large number of stone and flint implements have been picked up in the vicinity of old trails, and along Big Sandy creek in the northern portion, showing that aboriginal travel along these old thoroughfares was of considerable importance.
